In particular, the present invention provides a method and a device which enable successive operations of implantation and removal of a prosthesis to be performed in the same operation, and which allow the prosthesis to be inserted and removed with a high safety level, so as to reduce risks of damage to the patient's anatomy. Existing methods and devices for prosthesis emplacement in a natural anatomical structure are suitable for implantation in anatomical structures where the area to be treated is relatively small, i.e. generally corresponding to the area of the bone that is to be replaced. In particular, it may be necessary to perform successive operations of emplacement and removal of a prosthesis in the same operation, so as to allow the prosthesis to be inserted and removed with a high safety level. One known type of prosthesis emplacement device comprises a handle and a guide which is housed in the handle. In particular, the guide comprises a guide rod which is designed to be introduced into the bone to be treated and a rotary cutting mechanism which acts at the distal end of the guide rod, on the bone. Known guides of this type are of particular use in the case of prostheses intended to be inserted in femoral bones, in which the bone is generally cylindrical in shape and has a relatively large diameter in the direction transverse to the longitudinal axis of the femoral bone. In this type of guide, the rotary cutting mechanism includes a distal end head which projects beyond the distal end of the guide rod, in order to enable it to contact the bone to be treated. However, in this type of device, the space available between the guide rod and the patient's bone is relatively small, so
