In a portable book type telephone, it is necessary to provide a dialling receiver for receiving a signal from a call station, and for converting the signal to dialling information. When the dialling receiver is to be dialled, there are two types, a first type is the so-called push-button dialling receiver in which the dialling receiver is "on", to receive the dialling signal, when a button provided in the dialling receiver is pushed. Another type is the so-called cordless dialling receiver in which the dialling receiver is "off", to receive the dialling signal, when an electrical cord is plugged in an electrical socket provided on the receiver. The portable book type telephone having the type of dialling
