Such devices include cannulae, catheters, syringes, needles and intravenous fluid connectors. Parenteral access devices are used for infusing fluids, such as fluids and medicaments, into a patient and for withdrawing fluids, such as blood, from a patient. Parenteral access devices and percutaneous tube systems must be periodically disassembled to change fluid-containing components and/or to replace fluid-exposed components that have become ineffective due to contamination and/or leakage. Such disassembly and reassembly are preferably performed in the aseptic environment of a healthcare facility. In the case of a healthcare facility, the percutaneous tube system is preferably disassembled when the patient is not under the care of the healthcare facility and is stored after use. For example, after a healthcare facility is clean and sterile, the tubes and connectors of the percutaneous tube system can be removed from the patient and stored, for example, in a locked, controlled storage area. In this controlled area, the percutaneous tube system is preferably not touched and is protected from contamination and loss of sterility by storing the percutaneous tube system in sealed containers. The percutaneous tube system components are then removed for cleaning and sterilization after routine use and the container is closed and returned to storage. A disposable percutaneous tube system which has a housing and a stopper receivable in the housing, the stopper including a septum for accessing a fluid to be injected into or drawn from a patient, has been described by U.S. Pat. No. 4,765,653. This container is preferably pre-sterilized before use by removing the septum and cleaning the septum with an alcohol swab. The septum is then reattached to the container and the container and stopper are rinsed with water to remove any remaining alcohol and reattached to the container. However, this container has
