This review is based on recent publications and our experience. For this purpose we first present a traditional histological classification of cutaneous lymphoma. Second, we discuss the clinical signs, the diagnostic tools, and the different treatment modalities of cutaneous lymphoma. Third, a brief summary of the pathogenesis, immunology, and molecular biology of the different types of cutaneous lymphoma is presented. Finally, possibilities for future research are discussed. All types of cutaneous lymphoma can be distinguished clinically and histologically and can be classified into low-grade and high-grade non-Hodgkin's lymphoma, as well as cutaneous lymphomas with a natural killer (NK) cell phenotype. Cutaneous lymphomas can be classified into T-cell cutaneous lymphomas, mature T-cell cutaneous lymphomas, mycosis fungoides, leukaemias, and immature NK-cell cutaneous lymphomas. Differential diagnoses are also very important, because many skin tumours can mimic cutaneous lymphoma. At present, the pathogenesis of cutaneous lymphoma remains obscure. It may be possible to divide cutaneous lymphoma into high-grade cutaneous T-cell lymphoma (mycosis fungoides) and NK-cell lymphoma. Most cutaneous lymphomas seem to be related to EBV. It is possible that the prognosis of patients with cutaneous lymphoma can be improved by early diagnosis and curative treatment, thus avoiding transformation of the clinical course.
