I like some of the features of the program, like audio magnification and mastering, the data display in the audio and the engineering views, but couldn't stand the workflow. In AVID Media Composer, the desktop becomes a giant tabular view so that you have a good look at the audio and metadata. In Nuendo, the audio and data views are much smaller. I think I like it, but there are a couple of things about it that are annoying: First, the layout of the tracks in any given session is based on the order in which you added tracks. If you have a long session, or lots of tracks, the order isn't very intuitive. I've found that it's much more intuitive if you switch the layout around to order it according to how you have your sessions set up. Second, there's no real way to organize your tracks into folders, other than manually. I find this especially annoying because I have dozens, maybe even hundreds of tracks in a project, so it would be nice to have them easily organized and easily accessible. So, after giving it a fair shot, I installed Nuendo again and set it up for a new project. I'm very happy with it this time around. It's a snazzy desktop, but the layout of the tracks is intuitive. It definitely feels like a Mac program, but it's still Windows-looking. After setting up the audio and data views the way I like them, I spend a lot of time just in the Mastering section. I find it more intuitive than it was in AVID Media Composer. The window has a large preview of the audio, which can be magnified to see the individual parts of an audio track. There's a spectrum analyzer, a noise meter, a scratch meter, a CD tray, a graph of signal and noise, a tool that allows you to adjust or limit a frequency band, and even a zoom tool to fine-tune the master level for each track. It's got a lot to offer. One of the things that I like is that if I 6d1f23a050
