One important purpose of toxicology research is to predict the effects of human exposure to environmental chemicals on health and development. Given that much of this research is conducted with animals, it is necessary to consider factors that may influence the biological actions of chemicals in animals to assess whether the animal's responses resemble what might be seen in humans. One of the most important biological factors to consider is whether laboratory animals are appropriate models for human health risk assessment. This paper attempts to offer some help in this regard. It examines differences that exist between laboratory animals and humans in terms of anatomy, physiology, pathophysiology, genetics, metabolism, and endocrinology. It reviews and discusses methods and materials that are used to induce biological responses in laboratory animals, including common pharmaceutical and toxic exposures and nonspecific stressors. It focuses on issues of standardization, confounding variables, and the influence of species on experimental results. It concludes with a discussion of methods for addressing these issues and the need for more research on appropriate animal models for human toxicity.
