DETROIT — In the last decade, the American car companies have been steadfast about one thing: their customers want smaller, tougher, and more fuel-efficient cars. That's often true. The problem for them and the rest of the auto industry is that it's true of Detroit automakers but not of Detroit suppliers, for whom the transition to smaller, tougher, and more fuel-efficient engines is harder, the underlying reason for the industry's woes. The Detroit News reports that Ford, the largest U.S. automaker by market value, is expected to hire about 30,000 workers over the next three years, including 18,000 in the U.S., to build its next-generation Focus compact car. During the same period, the Ford supplier company Magna (maker of the Lincoln nameplate) will add more than 2,000 jobs at an assembly plant in Lincoln, Neb. Neither company specifically mentioned any size or shape of engine but both said new fuel-efficient engines will be needed. U.S. auto companies continue to stick by their compact promise, and they're now reaching for the suppliers that could help them make it happen. Chrysler and General Motors are setting up production lines in the Czech Republic to make engines that will power their next-generation vehicles. Meanwhile, the Detroit automakers are up to their old tricks. In the last decade they've been adding small cars to the lineup and promising fuel efficiency without big changes in engines, and now they're going to rely on suppliers to make these promises true. It'll cost them money. And it won't work. U.S. automakers are leaving the hand-me-down suppliers of the past that are smaller and weaker, and the suppliers know it. As the Detroit News article points out, Magna has managed to keep Ford and GM's
