If you're interested in more details about the code, go to ourHave you ever tried to translate anything to another language? Do you sometimes just feel stuck? Today, I'm going to tell you about one of my favorite tools for doing translation work, and try to give you at least a small insight into why it has been so successful for me. Linguee Today, I want to show you Linguee, a service to translate text into more than 100 languages, and in my opinion, to all the strengths that it has. Just fill in your URL, hit Enter and you'll be redirected to the service. What's great about this tool is that its interface is a bit minimalistic, and designed for a bit more productive translations work. It goes without saying that if you want to translate several documents or even just one long page, it's a great idea to go straight into a bookmark. The main page of Linguee is very similar to the other bookmark tools you use all the time, and it features a text field where you can paste the URL you want to translate into your browser. There is an always present glossary button on the top right of the page and a magnifying glass. And that's it. When you hit Enter the Linguee website will automatically search for the text you've typed, and show you the results. All translation results are stored in the local machine's memory, and you can always go back to the previous result at any time. This gives you the possibility to go back to a previous translation and start over, and it makes Linguee great for more complex works, where you might occasionally make some small mistakes.

Linguee is just one of the many services to translate text online. There are literally hundreds of them and with the tools to choose from, it's pretty easy to find one that fits your needs. Given its popularity, Linguee has adopted the Web Translator API and now can be accessed through any other website as a iframe. The Web Translator API The Web Translator API enables many web browsers to generate and interpret a translation of an input string of text. To translate a given string using the API, the text must be written in a certain format, including the preferred language, the 6d1f23a050
