The binding characteristics of [3H]naloxone to guinea pig ileum and brain cortex membranes were investigated. In brain cortex, binding was saturable with a dissociation constant of 0.39 +/- 0.03 nM and a maximum number of binding sites per membrane of 360 +/- 27 fmol/mg protein. In ileum, binding was not saturable and the dissociation constant was 0.2 +/- 0.02 nM. The results suggest the presence of more than one type of [3H]naloxone binding site in the brain cortex. Battle of Langside, 1263 The Battle of Langside was a defeat for the rebel barons of Scotland and their allies (now the House of Bruce) against the forces of King William the Lion. The battle took place shortly before the Battle of Alnwick during the First War of Scottish Independence. The war was fought in a triangle of land between two rivers, the Esk and Tweed, with the main battlefield and castle being Langside. Background Having established his position in Scotland, King William the Lion of Scotland moved to assert his authority in the north of England. In 1199, while traversing the north of England and entering into lands that had been previously under the control of rebel Earl Henry of Northumbria, William was challenged by rebel barons near Warkworth, in Northumberland. The Welshmen that accompanied William were quickly routed, but the king was captured and taken to Newcastle, where he was imprisoned for three months. In May 1202, William the Lion escaped from captivity in Newcastle, and with an army of Northumbrian rebels assisted by Welshmen, moved north again. He defeated the Welsh rebels and took control of their lands. Soon after, he moved on to retake the lands controlled by rebel Earl Henry of Northumbria. In 1206, William's army surrounded and burned the castle of Alnwick, captured its garrison and destroyed its furnishings. Alnwick Castle was soon afterwards rebuilt, with the aid of Irish soldiers who were stationed in England at the time. Battle The rebellion in Scotland was led by William's half-brother, Fergus of Galloway and had supporters in c6a93da74d
