Malignant pleural effusions are the result of a diverse array of primary and secondary pleural-associated diseases. In a subset of cases the effusions are associated with the metabolic syndrome and are referred to as "malignant effusions of unknown origin". Effusions have been reported in which there was an excess of metabolically active cells and a relative paucity of specific protein markers suggestive of the primary aetiology of the effusion. It has been previously shown that the induction and/or activity of the effusion-associated alkaline phosphatase and gamma-glutamyltransferase can be reproduced in vitro by dialysed, pronase-treated effusions. Here we show that the induction of enzymatic sulfate depletion by effusions can be reproduced by dialysed, pronase-treated effusions, and is associated with a decrease in the ability of the effusion to replete sulfate from exogenous sources. We have also performed metabolic studies on preparations of effusions from patients with malignant pleural effusions of unknown origin to determine if such c6a93da74d
