the main difference between this translation and the english one is of course that the translator is a muslim. also the illustrations were done by an artist who is a muslim and the words and details were corrected by the biographer and supervisor of this book, maksud al-misri al-basri, an imam (may allah have mercy upon him). in this translation you will also find footnotes and thahqiq is the best translation of the word "comment". in fact my book is the only one containing is my own is the original manner. i am going to post a few of the quotations of this book in my blog, so you can compare and contrast with my book. i know how to appreciate a true masterpiece :). al risalah is a comprehensive overview of all aspects of life. it is a guide for the youth, giving them a complete picture of what is going on in this world. it is intended as a guide for the child's upbringing. it teaches the child the difference between right and wrong, and his role in life, his place in this world, and most importantly, the source of his knowledge and the principles on which he must base his moral and ethical conduct. this book is an invaluable guide to the child's responsibility to god and his accountability to man. the authors write the book for parents, teachers, and also for scholars to help them give lessons to their children. the mode of teaching is through dialogue and in every chapter the readers are asked to answer questions of the kind: what does it mean to be a good muslim?, why should i study the qur'an?, what is the relationship between qur'anic education and the study of the sciences?, what is faith?, etc. the important point the authors make is that "real knowledge must be based upon practice". their aim is to give the readers a sense of connection and a motivation to study and practice the qur'an in a proper manner. their instructions are simple and easy to follow, and they give the reader a sense of faith and confidence in allah and his prophet. this book can also be used as a reference for students of basic islamic knowledge. through its clear and concise contents, children will gain a sense of their responsibilities towards allah and towards each other.
