relative to the images taken for the implant surgery, the ct scanner uses radiation as a source of energy. in the presence of small atoms of radioactive material, the scanner uses its detector to record the energy that is reflected by the body. for a specific type of image, the data are converted to digital numbers, or "gray scale" values. the gray scale values are represented as shades of grey on a scale from 0 to 255. the higher the gray scale value, the brighter the area appears in the image. the most commonly used image acquisition technique is the radiography technique. it uses a radiolucent table on which the subject lies and is positioned between the scanning table and the x-ray exposure tube. the table is slightly tilted to the radiation source, and the x-ray beam enters the body at an angle. the x-ray beam travels through the body and is converted to a corresponding image on a film or digital plate. once the gray scale values of the desired areas have been determined, the gray scale values are converted to colors to create a color image. in computer imaging, the method of segmenting the image into specific regions with desired gray scale values is referred to as segmentation. segmentation can be performed manually or semiautomatically, such as in the brainvisa software <http://www.brainvisa.info/> . this software is used to segment sulcal surfaces, including the cortex and the subarachnoid space. first, let us say that this is not the best way to make your dentures. having said that it looks like a fun, unusual project, which is a nice way to learn about the software. it is also a great way to spend $1,000 for an ultimaker to make your own open source dental casts that you will be able to share with your patients. the project can also be fun at home as well.
