The compressed air systems are often expanded by regulators. This way, compressed air is brought into the end user's system through a pressure regulator. The compressed air is thus supplied under the desired pressure and flow rate. The automatic shutoff is very useful, especially for the connection of compressed air to tools where the compressed air supply must be stopped in case of malfunction. The pressure drop is also used for the disconnection and for the shutoff of the supply of compressed air. This is especially beneficial in the case of compressed air systems for tools, which are supplied with compressed air from a pressure bus. The connection to and the shutoff of the compressed air can be controlled with a single pressure drop. According to the manufacturer of this service unit, different regulations for the correct connection and disconnection of compressed air are possible. If a compressed air supply system is to be installed in a new or renovated building, a pressure regulator is available in many variants. This can be a passive or active pressure regulator. Most compressed air systems are set up with a passive pressure regulator. This regulator automatically produces a regulated and constant pressure. During the operation of the compressed air system, the degree of the pressure increase must be governed using a pressure regulator. The pressure is to be set up for the required application. Thus, with a wide choice of pressure regulators, compressed air systems can be adjusted individually to the individual application. Moreover, passive pressure regulators are easy to install and require no qualified professional services.
