in order to protect the security of the windows operating system, updates were previously signed (using both the sha-1 and sha-2 hash algorithms). the signatures are used to authenticate that the updates come directly from microsoft and were not tampered with during delivery. because of weaknesses in the sha-1 algorithm and to align to industry standards, we have changed the signing of windows updates to use the more secure sha-2 algorithm exclusively. this change was done in phases starting in april 2019 through september 2019 to allow for smooth migration. the previous sha-1 signing requirement is still supported for windows server 2003 sp2, windows server 2008 sp2, windows server 2008 r2 sp1, and windows server 2008 r2. to help protect the security of the windows operating system, updates were previously signed (using both the sha-1 and sha-2 hash algorithms). the signatures are used to authenticate that the updates come directly from microsoft and were not tampered with during delivery. because of weaknesses in the sha-1 algorithm and to align to industry standards, we have changed the signing of windows updates to use the more secure sha-2 algorithm exclusively. this change was done in phases starting in april 2019 through september 2019 to allow for smooth migration. to help prevent update failures, we are issuing a final announcement to inform users that they should review any signed updates before installing them. after the final phase, we will begin removing all existing unsigned updates from the windows update catalog and will remove support for signing with sha-1.
