After Bali, the negotiating group for the Kyoto Protocol met for the first time in five years on 8-9 November. In contrast to the tense Bali process, this meeting was more relaxed, but more substantive. The US government sent only two leading negotiators, meaning that it was up to the EU and Japan to conduct the bulk of the negotiations. The four central issues which had to be resolved by Bali remained outstanding. One of these was the content of and exemptions for national ISs. The AWG, which meets once every three months, was due to address the second of these issues at the next meeting in New York, a process which will take many weeks. The prospect of the US government providing the bulk of the negotiating effort in Bali has galvanised the UNFCCC to secure early presidential backing for the UNFCCC in a new President. The new President will most likely be elected in the first week of January. The Kyoto Protocol is legally binding through 2013, but the Convention will end in 2015. The US is not likely to stay in the Convention until 2025, so the political support for the UNFCCC will be key to ensuring its ratification by the US Senate. Outcomes from Bali are open to interpretation. Those who focus on the 'bad' outcomes point to the low level of ambition set by the Kyoto Protocol at the heart of Bali. Those who focus on the 'good' outcome point to the record of the Subsidiary Bodies, and the atmosphere in which the Kyoto Protocol was approved. The general view from a wide range of governments is that the three priorities are: keeping the negotiations process moving at a pace which creates an environment which will lead to a durable agreement; keeping the issue of the financial burden of the developing countries central to the negotiations; and trying to ensure that the commitments taken in Bali are applied in the future. 5ec8ef588b
