(CNN) Donald Trump's jabs at Robert Mueller are just beginning to pay off. On Thursday, he said he had an unbreakable relationship with the special counsel. And on Sunday, he accused him of working for "the other side." Trump's attacks are deft and well-delivered. His Twitter account has been a major battleground, but the full-fledged assault on Mueller and his team has begun to take shape. Trump has been leaning on Attorney General Jeff Sessions, who recused himself from the Russia investigation, in making his case against Mueller. But Sessions has not provided a ringing defense for Trump or stifled the Mueller investigation. Instead, he has been silent, or passive, in his handling of the investigation. The president's complaints are partly accurate. After all, Sessions recused himself and was appointed by Trump, not by former President Barack Obama. The latter's Justice Department had a different approach to the Russia investigation, and Trump is trying to make the best of a bad situation. He doesn't seem to be getting any support from Sessions, and his tone on Mueller is increasingly harsh. The attorney general is not the only one with a relationship with Mueller -- the deputy attorney general and the FBI director have strong ties to the special counsel, too. Trump's understanding of the law is also shaky. Again, the president is guilty of selective legal interpretation. He has argued that the broad scope of the special counsel investigation means that investigators could look into just about anything, including the Trump campaign's contacts with Russia. This is not the case. Under a 1987 statute, the special counsel must only investigate federal crimes. Trump's response
