Actually, the strong performance and brightness of the iPad Pro, while not perfect yet, is something I'm getting used to. I still find Apple's implementation of the Face ID feature to be far from reliable, but it's good enough to get you by on a daily basis. When I first started using the iPad Pro as my main Mac and photographers' test platform, the brightness feature has been a real annoyance. However, the Lightroom previews for other producers are noticeably darker on the iPad Pro even when the camera and lighting conditions are otherwise the same. In most cases, Lightroom now balances exposure, white balance, saturation, contrast, and brightness as I open the RAW preview, rather than applying the new settings to all the images. In other words, with sufficient RAM and processing power, Lightroom should be able to better deal with the brightness differences between iOS and macOS. I'm not holding my breath, but I'm starting to wish that I had the iPad Pro in hand with iOS 10 to verify what I just described. However, at least this argument has been settled by the appearance of iOS 11 on the iPad Pro. The pros of the iPad Pro's screen are numerous. Its wealth of pixels and near-perfect calibration make the canvas seem almost as large as that of a Mac screen. The touch screen works reasonably well, and I never felt like I was sacrificing accuracy on the iPad Pro. When used with a mouse, the ergonomics of the new design are great. I also experienced no issues with using the iPad Pro as a scanner, with the exception of some slight pixelation. With the exception of the paperweight Grey Docs, I find that it takes some time to get used to the new tools and workflow. Other features of the iPad Pro, such as Face ID, app startup, and the new Split View mode on macOS, are also noteworthy.
