Of course, my workflows have changed a bit in recent years as more and more of us move to a 4K output suite. I import 4K RAW files and tweak them at 6400 ppi (standard) in Lightroom. I then open them in Photoshop and bring them down to 4:3 display with the Retina preference. I analyze the lighting and use the correct output settings. After that, they go to the final step - output, and that is where all of my work is done. The iPad Pro is perfect for this workflow. It's lighter than a laptop, fits well in my lap, has pen support for my editing needs and the app power with the I/O card allows me to use it with the 8GB RAM option. Of course, there is a large electronic component of the $999 charge for the iPad Pro. One needs to check with the credit cards to see if there is a discount for continuing customers - it won't be too long before Apple announces their new product. And while we will be waiting for the new Mac Pro, the iPad Pro is an easy, inexpensive high end desktop replacement. Many users, myself included, want the latest and greatest for their home and office. It's also not as expensive as a Mac Pro. If you can get past the less-than-perfect OS, it is a marvelous, creative device for both work and play. When I first decided to review Photoshop on the iPad Pro, there was hope that this would be an easy buy. I tried to minimize the skills required to use the device and I found that easy to do. (If you do not yet use Lightroom, it is easy to use it with one glance in the iPad Pro photo app, or the Apple Documents. The iPad Pro is more like a supercharged version of the iPhone 6S.
