I was fortunate to be at Adobe Max last month, so I was pleased to see the number of new technology previews available at the show this year. Many of them could be incorporated into future Photoshop versions. Some, however, were experimental. In rapidly developing technology like AI, Adobe tends to show off its experimental stage stuff first. (In the case of AI, we actually got a sneak peek at Art Intelligence (beta) at Max .) Lightroom 5 has been one of the most interpreted software in my home. The help resources are extensive, and the team are exceedingly helpful. It may be a complex application for some, but is definitely not inaccessible. It does all you need and more. While still at beta, it is a great upgrade. I'm not specifically a Lightroom user, but I do have a few friends and family who are, and they are all really pleased with the upgrade. Just like photos, documents have a life that cannot be stopped. You can edit or modify a file after it is created, but there is a real limitation to what you can do. This Adobe update enhances that process with the introduction of Adobe Project files—workspaces for collaboration. In many current projects, files can be shared and modified at all times by more than one user. Adobe has recently launched a new style app, called Adobe Dashboard, which aggregates the new iPad Pro, the new Adobe Photoshop Sketch app, and others — a file app one-stop-shop at an affordable price point. You'll see 19 separate icons on your iPad Pro home screen once you install the app. After that, you'll have access to a customizable folder that displays a widget style guide. Once you've saved a file to a folder, it's added to the folder you're viewing and you can access that file from any device.
