To build the greatest app possible, we started with a simple question: How can we make Photoshop for the web faster, easier to use, and 100% reliable? We've invested significantly in our next-gen web technology, WebAssembly, to better support this trend, and today we're announcing the production quality version of Photoshop on the web, now more reliable than ever. In order to get Photoshop working on the web, we've had to pull some interesting web development tricks and use new technology like ClojureScript, JavaScript for the browser, and WebAssembly. We've needed to innovate in ways that would've been difficult to imagine in the past but have made developers and designers happy. And we've done it in a way that fits the way you work. For our reasons for extending Photoshop to the web, we designed the new web app to be accessible and easy to use, with all the Photoshop features a photographer could want. Using a standard web browser, you can access Photoshop on any mobile device that has Internet access. Now, what else can you do with Photoshop besides erase? We use it to make layers more vivid, reduce gradients, build panoramas, break up images, craft text, make collage-like documents, make artwork from your phone, and more. So, whether you're learning to build a website or just picking up a camera to start taking photographs, you're in good company because everything you need to make these things is right here in Photoshop.
