Increasing concentrations of endocrine disrupting chemicals (EDCs) are commonly observed in aquatic ecosystems, and have been linked to reproductive malfunction in several fish species. Endocrine disrupting compounds are reported to act through non-genomic and genomic mechanisms. Although many studies focus on how non-genomic endocrine disruption (EGED) of steroidogenesis leads to downstream effects, the impact of endocrine disruption on the enzymatic rates of steroidogenesis is still unknown. To evaluate whether modulation of enzyme activities may be a viable, practical approach for managing pollutant effects, we performed experiments to compare the effect of acute exposure of the acid-sensitive fish Gasterosteus aculeatus to EDC mixtures to the effect of individual EDCs in the presence and absence of nutrient composition typical of industrialized water bodies. Sexually reproducing adult G. aculeatus were exposed to EDCs and nutrients in the
