Stable performance for those using PS and Aperture is a welcome change, especially since they seem to be quite different systems. Aperture is all about automation and craftsmanship, while Photoshop is all about speed and efficiency. So the last question can only be answered by asking which tool you use to do what type of work. If it's more workflow-based, then you would be better off with Aperture. If it's more about creative endeavors, then you should stick with Photoshop. As a Final Cut Pro user, PS is the reason I used to use FCP in the first place. The most botched interface that I have used in my professional life is in FCP. As far as the quality of the tools and workflows, the only thing that it lacks is the typography tools that Apple can't seem to get right. Lightroom and Photoshop have been the most significant set of applications for video and still photography for a long time now. Say what you will about the UI's in both programs, their features and capacity are staggering. However, PS does share a couple of features which Lightroom doesn't have. These include multilevel tab controls and three-state color corrector hues. You can see a full comparison here. I think with more time, this could be a key reason to opt-in to the beta. I recently upgraded from version 4.0.3 to version 5.0.2. While I give the upgrades in those apps a passing grade overall, I was horrified to discover that the Lightroom and Photoshop updates had resurrected many of the bugs that had been present in version 4.0.3.

Adobe Photoshop is the number one choice for graphic designers, photographers and other content creators. Especially if it's the first time you're using the program, you'll need to know how to work the basic tools. It's safe to say that Adobe Photoshop is one of the most powerful design tools out there, used by thousands of artists and designers across the globe. And now, the Adobe Photoshop CC 2019 has now been released, giving creatives more power and control than ever. We sat down with Adobe's Creative Cloud editors to find out more about the new features you need to know to get the most out of your workflow. The Blend Clips tool allows you to manipulate the colors of an element within an image or video clip. You can use this to give a color to your content, and modify that color with whatever variation you like. This is a great effect to add color or contrast to a specific area of the image without making it look like a large, stand along color block. It's also one of the tools that is very popular among visual effects artists. What It Does: The Gradient tool enables you to change the intensity level of colors that surround an image or object. Colors can be blended seamlessly together within the image to provide a concentrated, yet natural effect. What It Does: The Shadow and Highlight tools are two tools that are designed to apply highlights and shadows to objects. You can adjust the brightness of the shadows and light that affects the pixels located in the shadow areas of an object. Adding a highlight to an object, makes that object more prominent to the eye. This is a great tool for bringing attention to an important object within the image. Adding a shadow to an object makes that object appear, dull. This is great for adding dimension and depth to an object, which makes it appear larger and more realistic. e3d0a04c9c
