One of the biggest changes in Lightroom 5 is the new file management interface. Essentially, the entire application has been rolled into one rotating screen that displays folders, display options, and collections of photos. The result is an interface that gives you access to all of the tools and features of Lightroom without ever leaving the application. This new interface is shown in the screenshot below. This new interface is the result of Adobe's most recent AI technology, Adobe Sensei. This AI technology, which runs on the back-end of Adobe apps, provides automatic access to all of the features of the software. Of course, you know, you are not required to use this new interface; you can continue to use the old, rather cumbersome system instead. But, recently announced features will only be available in the new Lightroom 5 interface. You have to choose which Lightroom interface you want to use when starting the software. The difference is shown in the screenshot below. In general, this new interface provides an easier, more intuitive look and feel. However, the interface does not offer as much flexibility in design as the old interface. Also, several of the three-pane views are now configured in one block. This results in three panels united together instead of the three separate panels for collections, previews, and catalogues. It doesn't look like Adobe sent me anything to review, and they've been burned by loyal users who were irked by Windows 10, but who may have decided to wait for this version. While I'm not thrilled that the software won't collect my InDesign CC subscription, at least I can return the next day if I want to.

The basic steps include creation of layers, layer grouping, and masking. Photoshop has a variety of tools and techniques that work together to create a design. The most common tools are the pixel layer adjustment tools (like levels, curves, and saturation), which is the most basic adjustment. The adjustment layer works on the pixels of the image on a pixel-by-pixel basis. The layer effect tools (like blur and emboss) is a way of combining effects on a single layer. The content-aware fill tools (like content-aware fill or photo-removal) allows you to selectively remove parts of an image. The masking tools (like eraser, magic wand, and lasso) let you edit parts of an image by tracing over it. The layer masking tools (like gradient or multiply) let you apply special effects to a layer by blending it with another layer. e3d0a04c9c
