The aim of this study was to determine the accuracy of diffusion-weighted MRI (DWI) in the differentiation of cystic lung lesions. Seventy-four patients with 75 cystic lung lesions (16 cysts, 20 hemangiomas, 16 bronchogenic cysts, 12 bronchiectases, and 13 atelectases) were retrospectively evaluated. In-patients with cystic lung lesions underwent DWI using the high-spatial resolution volume coil and a 1.5-T MR unit. A lesion was considered to have a hyperintense periphery when its signal intensity was higher than that of the uninvolved parenchyma in the affected lobe. The peak value of the lesion, lesion-to-liver contrast, and the ratio of lesion to liver, lesion to spleen and lesion to chest wall were calculated. At pathologic examination, cysts were categorized as either simple cysts or other cysts. The receiver operating characteristic curve analysis was used to determine whether the peak value, lesion-to-liver contrast, and lesion-to-liver and lesion-to-spleen and lesion-to-chest wall ratios best discriminate cysts from other cystic lesions. At pathologic examination, there were 24 hemangiomas, 19 bronchogenic cysts, 12 bronchiectases, and 16 atelectases. The mean peak value and lesion-to-liver and lesion-to-spleen and lesion-to-chest wall ratios were significantly higher in cysts than in hemangiomas (P <.001). Other measures, including lesion-to-liver contrast, were not significantly different. Peak value, lesion-to-liver contrast, and lesion
